* Photoshop Elements: An image editing program in the same vein as Photoshop but primarily geared toward a beginner or novice user. When finished editing, you can save your image to your hard drive, but you can also print it out. * iPhoto: The original iPhoto is an integrated image editor, viewer, and manager that runs directly from the Mac operating system. You can use the program to easily import images from your camera and manipulate them, but it is not very powerful. However, with the release of iPhoto '11, the program has received an update that makes it more professional. Its features include the ability to scan into the program, create slideshows, and import or convert video. * GIMP: Another in-depth image manipulation program. It was created by developers who used Photoshop to create a new free program. GIMP is designed to accomplish many tasks, such as painting, resizing, enhancing textures, and so on. However, it's not as feature rich as its inspiration. In addition, it can be very expensive. There are also several tutorials to help you with both basic and advanced tasks. * iPhoto '11: I discussed iPhoto in the previous section. For the new iPhoto, the major change is that it has been extended to handle images from Facebook, Flickr, and Vimeo. This is a great option if you want to manage all your photos in one spot. * Paint.net: A program that works like an image-editing program but without layers. Instead of organizing layers, Paint.net allows you to select objects, change their color, change their size, and even delete objects. You can also add frames to your photo before adding text. This program is great because you can easily edit your photos without rasterizing them. You can also use Paint.net to generate Web pages. * Paint.net 3D: A newer version of Paint.net that works with layers. Like its predecessor, it's easy to use and allows you to paint in 3D. It's really easy to use and a great program for beginners.

\] or support \[@CR9\] from the community. The mean baseline knowledge scores of community health workers were lower than of community caregivers. This is an important finding that is common in other studies \[@CR7], \[@CR15\]--\[@CR17\]. Compared to community caregivers, CHWs are not as extensively trained and engaged in the health system and they lack exposure to up-to-date information. They usually focus on community education, which is less information intensive and may lack depth and accuracy. Although community caregivers also lack much formal training, their work is often demanding and fulfilling and is integrated into the community. Moreover, when working in a large family or community, the community caregiver has greater opportunities to spend time with family members and hence acquire additional knowledge from them. Our study was subject to some limitations. Since its design was descriptive, no inferences could be drawn regarding causality. Secondly, all CHWs in the study are from one public health district. A larger, more diverse sample would provide more statistical power and confidence. Last, measurements were taken at a point in time, which cannot be considered immutable or enduring. Participants were not followed up, and the possibility of cohort effects and potential temporal changes in knowledge could not be ascertained. Conclusion {#Sec8} ===== In summary, this study of CHWs in rural Burkina Faso revealed that community knowledge of childhood diarrhea was significantly low at baseline and that there were substantial knowledge gaps among CHWs and the general population. The knowledge of CHWs and the general population was much improved one year later. CHWs' knowledge of EBM was the same as that of community caregivers at baseline and was significantly better one year later. It was notable that community caregivers had more knowledge of the possible causes of diarrhea than did CHWs, and this could lead to better counselling and behavior change for CHWs. CHWs should be better trained and more involved in health promotion programs. Additional files ===== {#Sec9} Additional file 1:Data collection tools.
