Rush By Brendan Conway The discovery of silver in the Nevada state in the mid-19th century yielded more wealth and poverty than has any other American state. Successive waves of miners - more than a hundred a month - streamed into Nevada's mines, created towns that became boomtowns. Friction between settlers and Native Americans caused violent clashes on a level previously unheard of, especially in Nevada. It was a remarkably quickly-changing time, and one of the nation's most significant and complex geographic regions. Thomas Ostrom, 19th-century White Pine, Nev. Courtesy, Nevada Museum of History and Culture Mining also deposited a large influx of settlers into the less-developed southern half of the state, including Carson City, the state capital. South and central Nevada were relatively devoid of any population until the mining rush of the late 1850s. As a result of the frenzy around the state, an unorganized, itinerant community emerged - men who were often veterans of the Mexican-American War, drifting west with little idea of where they were going. Many fathers and husbands had to quickly find wives and families. Communities formed around these men and eventually were formally incorporated as towns and cities. Silver camp claims often were settled along dry riverbeds. Development was nonstop, day and night, in which men frequently worked multiple shifts. Many cases of nagging and substance abuse also became commonplace. "Denizens of the Silverite Hills" by Thomas Ostrom, White Pine, 1869. Photographed by George P. Barker, Caspar Boenradt, The Nevada Historical Society Mining also consumed an amazing number of human lives. In the Goldfield District alone, about 31,000 men (98 of whom were African-American) were killed in a five-year span. While only digging close to 250 claims in Nevada in 1870 the mining deaths exceeded the number of injuries sustained when the Civil War ended. By the time this turmoil was over, Nevada was a real power, politically and economically. It would become the 31st state in the Union on October 31, 1864, and the U.S.'s 33rd in 1864. The Silver Horn Mines alone produced more than $1 billion worth of silver by 1870, and the mining industry became the state's most important source of wealth and wealth.
