This study compares the accuracy and reliability of the American College of Sports Medicine (ACSM) predictive equation for aerobic capacity and six other equations. The ACSM equation predicts the peak oxygen consumption (VO2max) of the laboratory test in 8 minutes but may be difficult to implement clinically because it does not include weight. The seven equations tested were the 6-minute walk, Minnesota walking test (6-MWT), modified Cooper age-predicted aerobic capacity (CAP score), Borg's Rate of Perceived Exertion (RPE) [Borg, 1986], RPE modified for walking (RPEw) [Borg, 1986], a RPE modified for exercise (RPEx) [Borg, 1986], and the Leicester Fitness Study (LFS) equation [Brenner, 1983]. The values for the predictions were compared with the actual values on the treadmill test. The ACSM equation was found to be the least accurate (mean of error of prediction = -46.5 +/- 2.9 mL/kg/min), while the LFS equation was the most accurate (mean of error = -8.9 +/- 6.1 mL/kg/min). The RPEw (mean = 0.62), RPEx (mean = 0.35), and RPE (mean = 0.32) equations were found to be the next most accurate. The mean error for the 6-MWT was -12
