A few questions: Why is window.onresize equivalent to `window.onresize = function() {}`? If `window.onresize` (for example, like in Chrome's DevTools) sets the event handler in `window`, why is it equivalent to `window.onresize = function() {}`? Does this statement make sense to everybody: `window.onresize` is the same as `window.onresize = function() {}`? A: Because of the fact that you can only use plain JS and not native event handlers in many situations (mainly bad x/y/z coordinate values or no current event handler in the code), all code which has to work on all browsers will use the "a function" to set the event handler. `window.onresize = function() {}` is the only way to set a generic event handler. Also, note the difference between `window.onresize = function() {}` and `window.onresize = window.onresize`. There, the former makes no sense and only has been used due to bad/dead code and the latter to explicitly make sure there's one and only one `window.onresize` function. Q: C# inheritance + Abstract base class Here is the basic structure of
